

College campuses experiencing racial tension

By Jay Brooks
Staff Writer

College campuses across the United States are experiencing a surge in racial tension and violence. Kluksweh, a nonprofit agency of the Southern Poverty Law Center, reports racially motivated hate crimes increased for the fourth consecutive year.

Last April, at Olivet College in Michigan, 36 black students left campus following a fight involving nearly 100 black and white students. The fight reportedly took place between students and two black male students had assaulted a white female student.

After the incident, black students, both men and women, who they received threatening phone calls.

In Lawrenceville, N.J., recently, a hazing ceremony involving an all-white fraternity at Rider College resulted in disciplinary charges against one student and Phil Kappa Psi alleged that "Nigger" was used as a pledge to let to act like they thought black men would act.

College administrators suspended the club's activities and the fraternity may ultimately be shut down.

Klanwatch's recently released annual report, which, among other things, gives figures on hate crimes, murders and assaults, shows the increase in hate crimes is not restricted to college campuses.

There has been a continued rise in the numbers of racially motivated in communities across the nation, the report says, including incidents of cross-burning and vandalism. Additionally, the number of hate groups has increased 27 percent during the past year—from 273 in 1991 to 346 in 1992.

Jerry Gore, director of Minority Student Affairs at Morehead State University, says college campuses reflect society as a whole and the increase in racial tensions is a reflection of the tensions within society. Gore blames the country's economic slump for further strains on race relations.

MSU President Dr. Ronald Eaglin recently allocated $10,000 for programs to promote "multiculturalism" on campus. Eaglin says it is important to do everything possible to promote interaction between different cultures and to promote an understanding of diversity. Eaglin said promoting multi-culturalism on campus was a high priority.

Mike Mincey, MSU vice president of Student Life, said a group representative of the campus community has been organized and will meet weekly to look at ways to best use the money. He said that by March the group hopes to have programs in place at MSU.

Chando Mapoma, MSU Student Government president, said there must be a consistent effort by all groups to work together in a positive way in order to achieve progress. Mapoma added, "Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. dream was not only his dream, it was everyone's dream."

Products claimed unfit for college advertising

By Susan Sebek

Suburban College
What do condoms, abortion clinics, alcohol, and heavy metal have in common? They've all been attacked as unsuitable subjects for advertisements in campus newspapers during the past year.

At Viterbo College in Larosse, Wis., College President William Medland dismissed the Lumen newspaper staff after reading the Feb. 24 edition containing an advertisement for condom use, an abortion clinic, a parody on using condoms, and an endorsement of the U.S. Supreme Court's constitutional protection of abortion.

He claimed these items had not measured up to three regulations in the college's publication policy manual.

"This handbook requires student works to be 'quality journalistic products that respect the Catholic character of the college and have contents "attributed to their authors."'

Medland charged that previous editions of the Lumen also had contained unsavory articles, but this particular issue was "the straw that broke the camel's back."

He issued a statement claiming such journalism "looks up to ridicule the Catholic nature of this institution."

But Lumen editor Stephanie

Klitzke said Medland never had discussed any disapproval with the paper before he fired the staff.

In addition, she claimed he had violated the publication manual policy declaring the "editors have ultimate responsibility for the content of their publications and faculty advisers and administrators must not serve as censors in editorial decisions."

The 33 Lumen staff members were "invited" back to the paper after agreeing to Medland's terms, which included having an expanded student publications board report to the college's academic vice president and recommending decisions for the staff.

Lumen adviser Richard Ruppel decided not to turn to the paper due to the "unconscionable harassment."

He said, "It is clear to me that Dr. Medland doesn't exactly understand what prepublication review means." The term is understood in the media as a euphemism for censorship.

In another matter, alcohol ads may be a thing of the past on Pennsylvania campuses if a task force's recommendations are adopted.

A report from the 35-member committee suggests banning such ads, along with ending bribery sponsorship of college athletic events.

The statewide task force was formed two years ago by the Pennsylvania Association of College and Universities (PACU) to study drug and alcohol abuse.

PACU president Gary Young explained that the task force has no power to implement its recommendations, but urged that these "long-range solutions" be used to "promote a more healthy lifestyle and an all-around better environment."

He added that he hopes these recommendations "are not prompting censorship."

But student newspaper editors claim the task force proposal limits their rights. Temple News editor Jan Watson called the ban a "First Amendment issue (that) would stop press freedom."

Likewise, Kutztown University advertising manager Kenneth Ryner predicted the college would lose up to one-fourth of its revenue if the alcohol ads were terminated.

A third advertising censorship issue, that has developed in New Hampshire in recent months centers on a classified ad placed by three Plymouth State College newspaper staff members.

The students claim they thought the following ad was "quite funny" when they wrote it at 2 a.m. "Three horny men looking to tag-team young Afro-American virgin." Their telephone numbers followed.

qualities necessary to make it as a national news journalist. All of us who work with her at The Trail Blazer are really excited that she is getting this opportunity. Her participation in the Dow Jones Fund program will open up a number of professional doors," Hall added.

The selection of finalists for the intern program is based on the student's journalism background and academic performance. A combination with an editing writing exercise.

"I'm really thrilled about this opportunity. Not every college student has the chance to get this kind of on-the-job training before graduating and I know I'm lucky to be working and learning my craft at a major newspaper," said Melton, whose career goal is to be a newspaper journalist and ultimately become a newspaper editor.

Melton began working with The Editor in Chief James Hamlin said the ad "was not intended as any sort of sexist, racial or personal slur against someone, but instead as a joke."

But Plymouth State College officials didn't laugh. The newspaper adviser placed the three students on probation, and the all-student publication board voted for suspension.

However, the intern editor in chief reinstated the suspended editors in their positions. Then the college's seven-member media advisory board, which includes students, faculty, and staff, met to decide what recommendations to make.

In spite of this committee, College President William Farrell told it upon himself to write the three students to step down permanently. Hamlin said they would not resign because they had a constitutional right to run the ad.

Furthermore, he said any recommendation from the media board would be unconstitutional.

The media advisory board on an entry is absurd because they do not know the first thing about how to run a newspaper, Hamlin said. "The board is a form of censorship in itself."

He added that the only good thing to come of all this controversy is that "campus apathy gave way abruptly to unprecedented public debate of racial and sexual issues."

Trail Blazer is a contributing writer in the fall of 1990, served an entertainment editor the following fall and last semester was campus life editor.

She is a member of Gamma Phi Beta sorority and has been a tutor/intern at MSU's Destination Graduation Program. A former residence hall Association, Melton serves in the U.S. News & World Report.

The Newspaper Fund is a nonprofit foundation whose purpose is to encourage young people to consider careers in journalism. Scholarship funds and training program grants are provided to the Fund by Dow Jones and Company and the other news organizations that have interests selected through this program. The Fund has operated college student intern programs for 33 years.

Ask Bob!

Q: I have purchased many Bargain Brand items from the Georgetown store and find them to be an exceptional value. Can I expect the same names to be on these items a year from now or are substitutes likely?

A: Our Big Valu buyers have carefully evaluated, tested and compared the quality, price and value of each and every BARGAIN BRAND item we stock. Unless a current item falls below your expectations, I will remain as part of our "money-saving mix" for a long time to come. Do you have a favorite? Let us know.

Free trade could be President Clinton's most vexing problem

Upon assuming office nearly a month ago, Bill Clinton inherited a lot of political baggage from former President George Bush. The military mercy mission to Somalia, cat-and-mouse game with Saddam Hussein and sputtering post-recession economy are all problems from the past that will mark this term of the now-and-future president.

One problem Mr. Clinton may find particularly vexing is the three-inch thick document called NAFTA, the North American Free Trade Agreement. NAFTA, embraced by the Bush Administration during mid-1992, will set the rules for trade between Canada, the United States and Mexico for at least the next decade. Candidate Clinton endorsed NAFTA with his now-familiar hot/cold two-step rhetoric during the campaign, leaving the door open for some reconfiguration of its terms. Congress' thoughts on the subject range through a spectrum nearly as large as Clinton's, making NAFTA the subject of some lively debate on trade, both free and fair.

The topic of Free Trade vs. Fair Trade is frequently in the news these days, due to both NAFTA and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT). Both GATT and Free Trade is the rallying cry for capitalism, for unfettered markets, and the economic system yearned for by the huddled masses in the former Communist countries. Free Trade conjures up images of auctions, yard sales and lemonade stands. Free Trade - to many - means a healthy, vibrant economy.

But we put limits on free trade. An uninhibited view of free trade would not condemn price-fixing: why shouldn't companies be allowed to get together and set prices? If you don't like the way it's done, it's your fault. Free trade would not insist on flame-retardant pajamas for infants, or air bags in automobiles, seat belts, ingredient lists on food products, laws on insider information, environmental regulations or a host of other restrictions that we have placed on businesses in America. As a society, we have decided that government has a role in protecting the public beyond merely telling people they are "free" not to buy products they don't like, or that are unsafe. No, we don't really have "free trade" in this country.

We have made conscious political and economic decisions to require certain health and environmental safeguards for both workers and consumers. And we have decided that workers must be paid a fair wage for a fair day's work. These decisions have been made by the American people, through their elected representatives. Under both the GATT and NAFTA, however, our insistence on fairness, safety and environmental protection would be severely affected, if not lost altogether.

GATT and NAFTA, free-trade safety regulations would be made by the Codex Alimentarius, a Rome-based subgroup of the United Nations. Worker pay and environmental standards in the U.S. would be eroded steadily by the corrosive effect of seeing companies relocate to Mexico and other environmentally lax nations, where significant savings await manufacturers who don't mind pumping toxins into the air and water. In fact, that is happening now, as firms such as Smith-Corona and A.O. Smith make the "run for the border," where labor is cheap ($1.2 per hour) and pollution regulations virtually nonexistent.

Free Trade, on the other hand, would demand that firms seeking to import manufactured products into this country abide by safety, labor and environmental laws similar to ours. Fair Trade would pull Third World wages and pollution standards up toward ours, rather than provide incentives to escape the regulatory net by fleeing south. The so-called "Free Trade" movement has devastated our manufacturing sector, and led to worker and environmental exploitation in the Southern Hemisphere and Pacific Rim. American manufacturers who produce goods in a safe, responsible and environmentally friendly manner should be rewarded, not driven out of business, by the maquiladora plants south of the Rio Grande. Hopefully the Clinton Administration will see the folly of Free Trade before GATT and NAFTA are fast-tracked through Congress. Free-wheeling and fair-dealing are two different things altogether.

Why does sexuality matter anyway? We're all human!

Today's college student has enormous pressures from all aspects of life. From paying tuition fees on time and maintaining an above average GPA to keeping good relations with his/her roommate, balancing friends, dating and school—all students go through these hard times. Students shouldn't have to deal with the pressures of ridicule from their fellow students.

I am a gay college student in my sophomore year at MSU and I cannot believe some of the prejudiced things I see on campus. Guys don't break off of nature; we are normal people. I don't dress or act any different than other college guys do. I wear Polo shirts, Bugle Boy jeans and Reebok shoes. When I go into the shower, I could care less about who is in there with me. I don't stare. I'm gay. I'm not some kind of sick pervert.

Just because a person is attracted to someone of his/her own gender doesn't mean he/she isn't normal.

What I do in the privacy of my bedroom is my business - no one else's.

Not all gay people act feminine. I act very much like a typical "straight" male. Most people think you can determine who is gay/straight by their actions, mannerisms and dress. This is just not true. I know gay people on campus that act like "typical" straight people.

If you judge someone, judge them for who they are, not what they are. Instead of everyone worrying about everybody else's sexual preference, we all are really here to receive a college education. You never see gay people pointing and yelling "breeder," then why do heterosexuals do that to gay people? I think all prejudiced heterosexuals should have to live as a known gay for a year. I think then the tune of the music would change. When is everyone going to grow up and realize there is only one race - the human race. In the words of the music group Extreme: "Stop the World, I Wanna Get Off!"

Thurgood Marshall, others were real American heroes

By Damon Long
Recently, one of America's greatest heroes died, former Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall. I call him a hero because he and his mentor Charles Hamilton proved to the Supreme Court that separate was anything but equal. Segregated schooling was an unjust and immoral practice, and on May 17, 1954, it came to an end. The highest court in the land finally gave truth to the words "All men are created equal." But it did not end there.

Only two states, Texas and Arkansas, complied with the Supreme Court's decision that year, for a grand total of three desegregated school districts. Proving that the majority of white America would only obey laws that kept them above the "lowly nigger race." Once again, black people had to fight for a basic right that whites were "entitled to."

When the school board of Little Rock decided it was time to desegregate, it was met with angry opposition. Fear of blacks in the 1950s, racially mixed dances and love scenes in classic plays prompted an incredible backdash. It was 1956 before the topic was officially addressed by Governor Orval Faubus. He said he could not "be a party to any attempt to force acceptance of change to which the people are so overwhelmingly opposed." After the NAACP took the case of Arkansas to the court, the plan of change, but the negative feelings remained.

During the summer of 1957, approximately 75 high school students signed up to attend Central High School. Thanks to the efforts of the Little Rock school board, only nine remained on the list for the first day of school. None of the students whose parents sued Arkansas were among them. The school board wanted "good" negroes, not "radical" ones.

What they got were nine students who were determined to get an education. Each day, they were followed, threatened and harassed by mobs of angry whites, but they held their ground. Their school day began with an armed escort to the building and ended the same way. But through it all, they held their ground.

In my opinion, Jefferson Thomas, Carlotta Walls, Gloria Ray, Elizabeth Eckford, Thelma Mothershead, Melba Pattillo, Terence Roberts, Minnijean Brown, Ernest Green and former Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall are all American heroes.

Descriptive metaphysical book lacks originality, depth

By Laurie A. Silver
Contributing Writer

Richard Bach's description of flying is like no one else's. He writes about it with reverence, the way other men might describe a lover. His prose is radiant and you not only imagine flight, you almost hear it, smell it, feel it. When Bach describes easing back on the throttle, you discover that you've unconsciously wrapped your fingers around an imaginary throttle and done the same. Flight, whether described from the cockpit of a biplane or from the perspective of a young seagull, is always verbed with the same majestic elation. It's Bach at his best.

"Illusions: The Adversities of a Pilots' Messiah" is Bach's 1977 masterpiece on man, machine and metaphysics. In this case, the machine happens to be an airplane. Bach's preferred mode of transportation. As always, he arrives about flying with a mystical bent. "Illusions" is the autobiographical story of a "thornbush"—a solitary wanderer who flies from town to town selling ten minute plane rides for three dollars a shot. He meets another barnstormer, a kindred spirit about whom he writes through a series of mysterious, impossible feats. Richard discovers that his new friend Donald Shimoda is actually his metaphysical mentor, and that they have a karmic relationship forged in lifetimes past. This "reluctant messiah" has appeared because Richard has lessons to learn and Don is the catalyst through which he will learn them. Lessons concerning freedom, choices, strength and healing competence.

Bach's books are always variations on the same theme. He is always a pilot and flight is his metaphor for the soul's yearning for freedom. His autobiographical protagonists always reaches beyond his grasp, trying to accomplish whatever the conventional wisdom dictates can't be done. He repeatedly questions the limitations imposed upon the body by the mind as well as the illusory nature of physical reality. He writes about what he knows (flight) and what he wants to know (the secrets of existence).

"Illusions" is a somewhat minimalist and flawed version of a book Bach secretly wrote again and again. Man flies, man meets mentor, man is a Deep Thinker asking Important Questions trying to understand the Big Picture.

Bach sees himself as a mystical renegade on the intellectual fringe. Where he begins to go wrong is in his presupposition that his search for wisdom and insight is unusual, and that his ideas are so out of the ordinary. During the past twenty or so years, the New Age has spawned so many books concerning everything from chakra balancing to reincarnation. It's difficult to understand why he thinks that his mystical insights are so far out.

The world is not what it appears to be; and we are deceived by the illusory nature of time, space and form. So "these revelations" are nothing new. Hindu Vedantic tradition and Buddhism elaborated on these concepts centuries ago. The reader gets the impression that the author, while flirting with such heady ontological questions, never takes himself off the volumes of dead spiritual and philosophical literature which deals specifically with just these issues. It's as though Bach is intellectually reinventing the wheel. You'd think that a writer might do a bit of reading.

Another problem with Bach's work has to do with how seriously he takes himself as a Seeker of Truth. Granted, there are numerous aphorisms sprinkled throughout the book, but "Argue for your limitations, and sure enough they're yours," hardly qualifies as the wisdom of the ages. Bach finds his own ruminations profound indeed, and this begins to wear thin, especially if one postulates his rather simplistic metaphysical musings with the wisdom of ancient mystical traditions.

That he fancies himself to be so profound is somehow subtly patinizing in the reader. One gets the distinct impression that he thinks people are basically mindless sheep. Does he really believe that looking for meaning in our experiences and our relationships is so extraordinary? In "Illusions," as in his other books, Bach writes beautifully about the joys of flight. It's what he does best, and it's one of the reasons why his work is generally so compelling. He always raises some interesting questions, and the fact that his books are consistently best sellers indicates that the spiritual and metaphysical questions that he raises resonate for millions of other people as well. That noted, perhaps it's time for Bach to stop underestimating the depth and the intelligence of his readership. After six books which dance around the same old queries, his audience may be ready for a few less questions and a few more answers.

Mascis leads a new generation of guitarists

By Noel Reestoff
Staff Writer

For some reason, rock music fans who were born in the early 1970s and later seem bitter about missing the hey-day of some "classic rock" guitarists. You know, the type who whine about how all the great guitar players died out with the 1960s and 1970s. Burned out is a more suitable term. Rock fans shouldn't worry though because someone has always carried the rock guitar torch.

For the past eight years, J Mascis of Dinosaur Jr. has proven himself as one of the finest guitar players around and shows it once again on Dinosaur Jr.'s new album, Where You Been.

Not only is J Mascis a supreme guitar player but he is a great songwriter and even the best solo can't save a bad song. Of course, Where You Been has NO bad songs (just one weak track, Drawings) and nothing but wonderful solos. Although Mascis' voice has potential to annoy some, the vocals are still good and sometimes downright beautiful.

The Neil Young influence of Dinosaur Jr. is plain as day and not avoided. "Out There" is a "Like a Hurricane/Cinnamon Girl" power song with sad and alienated lyrics and equally sad guitar solos. "On the Way" is a obvious tribute to all the creepy fableto songs that grace many a Neil Young album and Mascis nails the tribute wonderfully.

Of course, there's more to Dinosaur Jr. than Neil Young comparisons. Mascis isn't an imitator and always pours enough of himself into every song. "Get Me" is depressing with surreal guitar breaks and a wonderful shared chorus with Tiffany Anders (Ok, I don't know who she is either). Although the beginning guitar work on the first single, "Start Chipping," isn't that good, the rest of the song sounds great.

There are other hand members in Dinosaur Jr. but Mascis is the key figure and really makes all the other "players" meaningless. It would be unfair to mention Dinosaur Jr. without mentioning the former lead players and their band Sheebosh which is also putting out good contemporary rock. So when someone complains about the lack of modern guitar legends or better yet, when someone claims that some pompous, tenth generation speed-freak virtuoso is a legend, pull out Where You Been and let them hear what REAL guitar playing sounds like.

Comedian Tommy Blaze performed Tuesday, Feb. 9 at Sutton Auditorium. Blaze arrived late but the crowd was entertained by SGA President Chando Mapoma who told jokes and asked for the audience member's opinions concerning SGA activities.

SGA Comedy Series scores another success

By Kevin Lindsay
Staff Writer

The SGA comedy series continued last Tuesday with Tommy Blaze's successful act. Blaze performed an entertaining comedy routine that kept the audience laughing.

It looked as though SGA President Chando Mapoma was going to have to perform a comedy act because Blaze arrived a few minutes late.

Blaze joked about subjects such as growing up, grown-ups, James Bond movies, relationships between men and women and the tricky questions women ask—the ones where however you answer, you will get into trouble. Blaze got one of his biggest crowd reactions when he talked about Southern people and the way Southerners talk. He joked fun at people in the crowd, places he stopped on his way to Morehead and Southern women in country bars.

With all the laughter, Blaze's act did contain a serious message. When he talked about sex and drugs, he urged the audience to have safe sex and also to stay away from drugs, because of the deadly consequences of each.

Blaze was given a big round of applause as he left the stage. Jennifer Kessler, a freshman from Louisville, said she felt Blaze was very entertaining. She said, "There isn't much to do in Morehead on Tuesday nights. I really enjoyed being entertained and not being bored (for a change)." Tyra Bell, a freshman from Williamstown, Ky., said, "I think it was a really good show. I haven't laughed so hard in a long time. And, besides, I think he is kind of cute."

Tommy Blaze has appeared on Star Search, MTV's Half-Hour Comedy Hour, Showtime and in many clubs and campuses across the nation.

For those who missed Blaze, or for those who would like to see him again, he will be appearing in a new comedy series called, "Hog Heaven" on Fox Television in the near future.

MOVIES MOVIES Cynical Murray relives Groundhog Day in movie

By Angela H. Hazeltaker
Managing Editor

Life may get pretty dull sometimes, but can you imagine what it would be like if you had to live the same day of your life over and over? Now, imagine that day was Groundhog Day.

This is exactly what Bill Murray is faced with in Groundhog Day. Murray plays a weatherman who is sent to a remote area of Pennsylvania to cover the town's annual Groundhog Day festivities. He has been covering this event for four years and has become slightly cynical of the whole thing.

On the job Murray is not known for his charm or tact and his new producer, who is quite attractive, is quick to point out on this as the heads out with him to do the Groundhog Day thing. She tolerates him because he's the talent. He soon falls for her, but his ego keeps getting in the way.

After Murray realizes that time is standing still, for him anyway, he begins to use it to his advantage. He finds out important information about people one day and uses it the next. This is the method he uses to win the lovely producer's heart. Pretty clever, huh? The only problem is that the next day he has to start all over again. He remembers everything, but she hasn't got a clue.

Eventually Murray becomes tired of all the games and can't take Groundhog Day any longer. At this point he tries every type of suicide known to man, but to no avail. Groundhog Day lives on. The ending is pretty predictable (I won't spoil it for you) and the movie is redundant at times, but it's a cute movie and Bill Murray makes it well worth watching.

Lady Eagles defeat Eastern Kentucky in double overtime

By Todd Wilson

Sports Editor

The Lady Eagles went two for three this weekend as they knocked off Eastern Kentucky and Murray State and failing to a tough Southeast Missouri team.

Morehead State 110

Eastern Kentucky 106, 2 OT

The weekend started Thursday night for the Lady Eagles as they traveled to Richmond to meet the Lady Colonels of Eastern Kentucky.

Sherita Joplin started things off for the Lady Eagles with a jumper that made the score 2-0. Sue Zylstra answered back tying the score. Bev Smith then got her first bucket, but was answered by Jarce Goodin. Two foul shots by Soni Eden and a jumper by Brenda English were able to give Morehead State a four point advantage with 17:33 remaining in the half. Later, back to back layups by Smith put the Eagles up to eight, 16-8. But the Lady Colonels quickly answered back with a 16-0 run, taking their own eight point edge. With just under six minutes to go in the half, two Shanah McIntosh free throws put the EKU lead in double figures, 30-20. A late run by MSU tied the score inside a minute to go, 36-36, but McIntosh jumper and a free throw by Rhonda Hardesty gave Eastern a 39-36 halftime advantage.

A baseline jumper by Smith tied the score at 42-42 with 17:17 in regulation. Megan Hupler's jumper from English returned the lead to the Lady Eagles. Joplin's layup took the lead to four before Kim Roberts hit a three-pointer to make it 46-45. With 1:50 to go the clock, Goodin hit two free throws to return the lead to EKU, 54-53. This was quickly raised to five points with free throws by Hardesty and Zylstra. Hupler, Eden and Joplin combined to put Morehead on a 8-0 run to give the Lady Eagles a three point edge, 65-62.

The lead traded hands ten more times before Kim Mays hit the second of two free throws to tie the score with 1:02 in regulation. Several attempts by the Lady Eagles to win the game fell as the game went to overtime tied at 79.

Zylstra opened the extra session with two free throws giving EKU the two point edge. Hupler hit a free throw to cut the lead to one before McIntosh hit a layup to increase the margin to three, 83-80. Six straight points by Hupler and Heather Reed gave the Lady Eagles a three point edge. Mays tied the score with a three-pointer. Hupler's layup was matched by Tiffany Mayfield's jumper. Mayfield then hit another jumper to match Reed's basket. Again, an attempt by the Lady Eagles fell short at the buzzer as the game went to the second overtime tied at 94.

The final period was all Morehead State. Joplin and Hupler each hit layups and were followed by two charity tosses by Eden to let Morehead surpass the century mark, 100-94. Zylstra's jumper was matched by Reed's layup. The lead
